INTRODUCTION

MODERN historical teachers talk continually of the sources. You must go to the sources is the burden of their counsel to their students who desire to construct an historical narrative. Their advice is proper, but older men who started with the term of original authorities, that means the same thing, weary of the word sources, not because the idea suggested is not sane, but because an extension is given to the meaning by ambitious writers, who spare no pains and criticize others whose pains are not exerted in the same direction. There are men, for instance, who are not satisfied with an Act of Congress as printed in the Revised Statutes, but must go to Washington to get a sight of the original engrossed copy. They envy the man who had to consult the Journal of the Confederate Congress in manuscript, and they would like to spurn the well-printed copy furnished them by a beneficent government. They envy Nicolay and Hay, whose work was in advance of the printing of the Official Records, and who therefore were obliged toward the end of their History to consult the Records in manuscript in the War Department archives. It may not be well to emphasize this excessive labor as modern, applying modern to the period of the scientific teaching of history in colleges and universities; for Bancroft, according to Thomas Wentworth Higginson, fell into "that error so common with the graphic school of historians—the exaggerated estimate of manuscripts or fragmentary material at the expense of what is printed and permanent."

In the Confederate room of the Boston Athenæum these source advocates and the older men may meet on common ground. The sources for the study of the unique life in the Southern Confederacy are there. Many bound volumes of Confederate newspapers, magazines, and reviews; school books of arithmetic, reading, spelling, geography, and grammar; "Maxims of War," one of which, Napoleon's, was in constant use by Stonewall Jackson; serious books, sermons, and tracts; almanacs and railway guides; novels and stories to entertain the soldiers who found camp life irksome;—all these may be found in this room, the materials of which were gathered for the future historian. The source-fiend may indeed regret that many reports of battles and other official documents have found their way into the Official Records, as in his view each copy or reproduction reduces the value of the source. Moreover, he is not satisfied without seeing other collections, and so he journeys to New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Cleveland, to the Southern cities and other places where he hears of Confederate material, and exhausts himself in this thorough search, but is happy as he reflects that his procedure is according to the canons of scientific investigation. His tiresome journeys might have been spared had he asked one of the courteous attendants to bring him the volume of Emerson wherein he gives one of his views of travel. "The soul is no traveller," Emerson wrote; "the wise man stays at home. . . . He who travels . . . travels away from himself. . . . Travelling is a fool's paradise."

The older man settles himself in the Confederate room, and as he gazes at the bound volumes of newspapers and at the other volumes, the outside aspect of which is eloquent of the life in the Southern Confederacy, he thanks his stars that he has such a privilege, and he blesses the men who had the forethought to make so valuable a collection for him as he thinks and writes of society at the South. But the eager and ambitious source-fiend looks at his labor and says, But you should see the collections in Philadelphia, in Washington, and in Cleveland; you cannot arrive at the truth unless you go to the bottom. The bottom is here, replies the older man. This collection, with the priceless Official Records and other books bearing on the subject at hand, is all that I can compass. My mental digestion is not equal to more. Pray let me remain in my comfortable home, independent of the sleeping-car conductor and porter, hotel clerk, and librarian in a strange library, the method of which, however admirable, is not the Athenæum method. And the older man, with right on his side, remains. He digests his material and, believing with Carlyle that "there is the indispensablest beauty in knowing how to get done," he does not fathom even the material in his beloved Athenæum. The wise men who brought it together at the end of the Civil War laid out too much for him, but he does his best to show his appreciation of their labor and forethought; and as he sits in that classic Library, hallowed by so many fond associations, he reads, observes and reflects.

It matters little to the old-fashioned student whether the Confederate collection in the Athenæum is the best in the country. He believes that it is second to none and he knows that it suffices for his wants. As he pursues his studies he has the student's feeling of gratitude to those who had so marvelously anticipated his wants. With great interest he reads the report of the Committee on the Library for January, 1866: "The sudden collapse of the Rebellion in the early part of the year, seemed to the Committee to furnish an opportunity which should be instantly used, of obtaining the newspapers and other publications issued at the South during the war; and of which very few had ever gone beyond the Confederate States. These fugitive publications had a peculiar historical interest and unless secured promptly, before they were destroyed or had fallen into the hands of collectors, they would be forever beyond our reach. A Poor Richard's Almanac of the year 1752 is priced on an English sale catalogue at five times its weight in gold. And one hundred years hence, a Rebel almanac, or a dingy file of Southern newspapers may, perhaps, reach a corresponding value. One of the Committee [Mr. Parkman] who was visiting Richmond soon after its capture was supplied with funds for the purpose, and made very valuable purchases; among which was a file of the Richmond Examiner from February, 1861 to March 31, 1865—the last paper printed before the city was evacuated. From this file, not a paper is missing—not one torn or mutilated in any manner. He also secured some important books and pamphlets. The Librarian afterwards opened a correspondence with persons in many of the Southern cities, by means of which a very large and valuable collection of rebel documents and publications has been made.

Files nearly complete have been secured of the following daily newspapers printed in the Confederate States during the war, viz: Richmond Enquirer, Richmond Whig, Richmond Dispatch, Richmond Sentinel, Augusta (Ga.) Sentinel, and Mobile Advertiser. Several other partial files have also been obtained. Complete files of the Southern Punch (an imitator of its London namesake), Southern Illustrated News, Magnolia, Southern Literary Messenger, and Record, all published at Richmond, have also been purchased." This report was undoubtedly written by the Librarian, William F. Poole. To his activity more than to any other one man is due this remarkable collection, a credit to the Athenæum and to Boston.

The Trustees, with far-seeing wisdom, at a previous meeting had voted "that the action of the Library Committee in procuring rebel newspapers, books and documents be approved and that they be requested to continue their endeavors to procure such papers." No historian can have other than a thrill when he knows that Francis Parkman, the greatest of his craft in America, was not only one of these Trustees, but bore an active part in securing this material. At the close of the Civil War he visited Washington and Richmond to see the battlefields, which appealed to his picturesque nature, and, furnished with a proper amount of funds, he procured much Confederate material. More valuable than the money were the training and experience applied to his task.

The literary historian affirms that you can do naught without the proper atmosphere. If you are going to write about the South, he believes that you must go to that region to get it. It is proper to inquire whether this indeed be necessary. True, if one could have been South during the war or during Reconstruction, one would have had an experience impossible to derive from historical documents. But what boots it to visit the new South, which "hurrahs for the old flag and an appropriation," which is full of energy and desire for money-making, which knows the value of its great crop of cotton and has gone into its manufacture, and which has shown its belief in diversified industries? If one desires to witness such a reconciliation as has never before taken place after a civil war, if one wishes to study patriotic fervor, let one go to the Southern States; but imagination will better create the Southern Confederacy in the Confederate room of the Athenæum. It is food for thought to turn over badly printed and bound books, to note newspapers gradually reduced in size, printed on half sheets, on brown and on wall paper.

Said Lincoln in his second inaugural address: "Both read the same Bible and pray to the same God; and each invokes His aid against the other." How well is this illustrated in the Athenæum. There is "The Soldier's Pocket Bible. Issued for the use of the army of Oliver Cromwell. [Original title-page.] The Soldier's Pocket Bible, containing the most (if not all) of those places contained in Holy Scripture, which do show the qualifications of his inner man that is a fit soldier to fight the Lord's battles, both before the fight, in the fight, and after the fight; which Scriptures are reduced to several heads, and fitly applied to the soldier's several occasions, and so may supply the want of the whole Bible, which a soldier cannot conveniently carry about him; and may be also useful for any Christian to meditate upon, now in this miserable time of war." After the Confederate victories of 1862, the Bishop of Georgia, preaching in Christ Church, Savannah, affirmed that "Our cause is in harmony with the purposes of God in Christ Jesus"; but when sorrowing over the death of Bishop and General Polk, he tried to console the congregation with, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." After the defeats of 1863, the Bishop of Alabama preached on "Future Good. The Explanation of Present Reverses," while a minister took for his subject, "The Battle is God's." As one immerses himself in this material, one cannot help appreciating Motley's remark, as he was studying the old letters and documents of the sixteenth century in the Brussels archives: "It is something to read the real bona fide signs manual of such fellows as William of Orange, Count Egmont, Alexander Farnese, Philip the Second, Cardinal Granvelle, and the rest of them. It gives a 'realizing sense,' as the Americans have it."

One finds a suggestion of the blockade in the "Book of Common Prayer" printed in London for "the use of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States of America," as pasted on the front fly-leaf of this book is this printed label, "From the cargo of the Anglo-Rebel Blockade Runner, Minna, captured December 6, 1863 off Wilmington by the Government Dispatch Ship Circassian." But before the date of this capture the Episcopal Church at the South doubtless found the supply of their vade mecum from England precarious, for one may learn in the Athenæum Confederate room that their bishops and clergy appealed to their brethren at the North to send down two or three thousand prayer-books; and the United States government gave permission for passing these through the lines of the Union Army.

What delights the source-fiend in this collection is an object of fault-finding by the universal critic. A part of the collection, the critic avers, has ceased to be useful. Many of the reports, messages, and other official documents and much of the correspondence have been reprinted in the "Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies," where they are systematically arranged and conveniently indexed. It is true that some of the books and pamphlets collected by Mr. Poole and Mr. Parkman have no longer the value then attributed to them; but they could not know that our Government would embark upon an historical work, impossible in Europe, and that it would have the faithful coöperation of the defeated as well as that of the victors. Their collection was made soon after the close of the Civil War (say 1865-66), while the first volume of the Official Records was not published until 1881. Rating properly this unique work, the fact remains that, for a study of the life in the Southern Confederacy, the collection in the Athenæum possesses inestimable value.
